The Canton News reminds us that there is another editor on the Republican ticket besides Thomas, and that the same is our esteemed friend, Judge Norton. To which we beg to observe—that the News, in taking this pains to locate so particularly the Judge, probably displays an ultra-cautiousness that ought to be a sufficient apology for his want of it.

The following resolution was adopted by the Dallas Library Association, September, 1872:

Resolved, that all the members of the Library Association who fail to pay their annual dues in the next two months, shall be suspended from the roll, as

JEFFERSON DAVIS.

The Disengaged Gentleman Replies Adversely.

The Board of Directors of the North Texas Agricultural, Mechanical and Stock Association addressed a letter to the Honorable Jefferson Davis, inviting him to be present at the coming fair. It will be seen by the following reply, received by the Secretary of the Association, E. G. Bower, Esq., that our citizens are to be disappointed in not having him with us:

"MEMPHIS, August 29.

"Sir—Yours of the 11th inst, reached this place during my absence, and hence the delay in this reply. It would give me sincere pleasure to accept the kind invitation of your Board of Directors, but I regret that circumstances will not permit me to do so. Please make my thanks to your Directors for the consideration with which they have regarded me, and believe me very respectfully and truly yours,

JEFFERSON DAVIS."

THERE is a man living down on Young street who is in the habit of watching the old year out and the new in, and didn't know why he couldn't just as well watch the summer out, and the autumn in. So he took a seat on the front stoop of a blooming widow's residence and sat there all night Sunday, on the "watch." In the morning that manless female got up an extra hot kettle of water for the "watcher's" benefit, let loose a warm-spirited hound on him, and got three of her admirers after him with shot guns. When asked now what he thinks of the theory of "watching" the departure and arrival of seasons, he says that it is simply traditional and that the modern argument against it he finds extremely obstinate.

John's Pretty Wife—A Short Story. At the early dawn of the late summer John would go. He could not be induced to leave his wife, his wife, the young, was in health, pale, emaciated and haggard. A parting kiss a few tears, and John bid adieu. During the first months of the war news came that John's wife had passed away. The war ended, and John, with honors, ears and scars, returned to his once happy home. John's wife, however, had died in giving birth to a son, and John, in his grief, said "but I will tell the world where once we were so happy." He knocked at the door, was invited in, and after a time, however, he laid aside his apparel, and a sonorous, loud scream, and fell into his arms. That lady was John's wife. "My dear Julia, what produced such a wonderful change in you?" "Dr. Dromond, English Female Bitter," was the modest reply.
